SUMMARY

Administrative and program support professional with direct experience in documentation, data tracking, and multi-system coordination.

Managed records and progress notes for hundreds of students across concurrent programs; built original systems from scratch with no template or prior framework. Comfortable working independently in a remote setting, handling diverse workloads with accuracy and a high level of professionalism.

Drawn to mission-driven organizations where organized, detail-oriented support makes a real difference for families.

Hiring Team

To whom it may concern:

When an organization depends on accurate records, well-coordinated logistics, and a support person who can manage a diverse workload without dropping anything, the work is only as strong as the person holding it together behind the scenes. That is the kind of role where this background is most useful, and it is exactly what the Administrative Coordinator position at Family Voices calls for.

In two years supporting a K–5 school technology program, daily administrative responsibilities included maintaining progress records for 400 students, coordinating scheduling for six concurrent intervention groups, managing meeting logistics, and keeping project files current across multiple systems, all while adapting to the pace of a school environment where priorities shift without notice. The reading intervention program ran independently for the majority of the school year: scheduling, facilitation, documentation, and follow-through handled without supervision. A 60% increase in monthly page traffic during a separately run online business came from the same discipline applied to content and communications work, managing multiple platforms and keeping records organized without a team to lean on.

Family Voices stands out because the mission is specific: families of children with complex health needs deserve to be heard at every level of the systems meant to serve them. That framing, family-led, equity-focused, and built around real lived experience, shapes the kind of support work this role requires. Culturally responsive communication, attention to how information reaches people, and genuine care for the populations a program serves are not additions to this work; they are the work. That alignment is real, not constructed for an application.

The combination of administrative experience, remote work independence, and the ability to manage high-volume coordination across concurrent workstreams maps directly to what this role requires.

Respectfully,
